reference materials and suggestions on how readers can get involved."In Washington, it seems that nothing is getting done about finding solutions for global warming. With Democrats and Republicans at a stalemate, decisions that will affect our future are not being made, and we, the people, are going to suffer because of it.In the chaos of constant criticism and debate regarding global warming and climate change, sometimes the best voices to listen to are the most innocent. Here are forty-five children who are trying to make a difference with our environment, which includes everything from pollution to animal endangerment.These awesome kids step forward to provide solutions to our most pressing environmental issues. Each young person is given the chance to express his/her beliefs about the topic and possible solutions to the problem.With breathtaking photography to colorfully illustrate what is at stake, these forty-five brave young people try to change the world. Will you listen?

This book for upper elementary/middle school readers profiles 45 young people who have taken action to help protect the environment. Nice truly global selection of included kids whose projects are described in short interviews as well as brief descriptions. Highly readable.

Great book to use to prompt kids toward taking action.
